

REASON IS NOT HUMAN NATURE AND PSYCHOLOGY OF ATTRIBUTIONS

For some years I had been extremely concerned that the idea that Reason is part of Human Nature was never actually true about Homo Sapiens and the idea was the propaganda of Socrates that gained popularity in the West and perhaps globally over time while being simply false. Socrates and all later noted philosophers including Descartes and others were thus deluded and Reason proper was not Human Nature at all all along.

I won't go into intermediate parts of history. Instead what I will do is jump to the issue of attributions and explanations we tend to use from the psychology perspective, especially Attribution theory which grew from 1950s in American Psychology and I was reading something by Bernard Weiner and I was reading Learned Optimism of Martin E. P. Seligman in the past week and suddenly it occurred to me that this might be deep. What I mean is that our own reasons and explanations for events are interesting for they have psychological shading and they tell us something about our psychological individual states. And this is in fact deeper than the bold and false conjecture that "Reason is Human Nature". Reason is not part of Human Nature, but out justifications and reasons do have some regularity and those are Human Nature.

To what extent our justifications and reasons for particular phenomena are actually 'Reason' is questionable. However the giving of the justifications and reasons is definitely part and parcel of human psychology.

Bill Gates did not let me have my $120 million from D. E. Shaw & Co. but he had repeatedly said 'he's not white so I can do this' to proceed to cut up my eyes and cause huge destructive damage to my interior, my Ancestral, family, romantic, and proceed to ruin my life. He claims 'whites are superior' and 'I'm not white so he is allowed' to harm me in any way. I ask the US Government to bring him to justice and arrest and kill him and they don't want to do that.

There is no Reason in these things. However there are many justifications and reasons in all this.
