

LECTURES ON ARISTOCRATIC REFINEMENT

ZULFIKAR MOINUDDIN AHMED

I am from an Aristocratic bloodline of 3000 years from Vedic India. My father and grandfather were both in civil service in Bengal, and they were both loved by the people. I have deep intuitive understanding of Aristocratic refinement of the East. In the East, it is not considered cultivated or refined for people to make people feel small and diminished. Now there are plenty of cats in the east with a bit of money who do mistreat others and make them feel small, but we true Aristocrats do not approve of this anywhere and consider these people to be boorish, uncultivated, nuveau riche, etc. We do not consider these types of barbaric people to be our equal. We consider those to be true Aristocrats who make people feel big when they engage with us, and consider making people feel small to be a matter of political tactics rather than preferred behaviour. I consider Bill Gates quite a bit smaller and inferior to me in reality; and in my own mind I am far grander. But you will hardly find anyone in the world who had ever met me who will have felt demeaned and small by me. There are some exceptions, but they are people who had their own problems. I do not consider disrespectful treatment of people to be lofty and elevated. That is the Aristocratic way of the East. In the West things are a bit different, but they are not that different. Catholicism in particular cultivated some of these refinements in Noble behaviour. People like Bill Gates are positively barbaric by my standards.
