

BILL GATES IS SURPRISED THAT I THINK I AM GENUINELY BETTER THAN HIM

ZULFIKAR MOINUDDIN AHMED

That is charming. That's so charming. Bill Gates is surprised that I think I am genuinely better than him. That's so charming I am smiling over here. Obviously I am much better than him. It's like saying "Oh my God, this man actually genuinely believes that 10 is a larger number than 1". Or "Oh my God, does this man genuinely think that vanilla ice cream is sweeter than lemon juice?"

How about, "Oh my God, this man genuinely thinks that he is better than me in literature because he writes exegesis of Rilke's Duino Elegies while I think Rilke just put words together and Edgar Allen Poe was better."

How about this: "Oh my God, this man genuinely thinks he's better at American political philosophy because he believes in natural rights of all people while I think it's claptrap and have a lifelong dream of ruling the world as its tyrannical emperor."

That's really charming. How about: "Oh my God, this man genuinely thinks he's better at Mathematics than me and has a magna cum laude from the world's best undergraduate Mathematics program at Princeton with prize for most original thesis of 1995 in several complex variables while I don't even have a college degree."

These are such astonishing and bizarre beliefs.
