

WHY IT'S EASIER TO 'DEAR' RUSSIAN GIRLS ON INTERNET DATING SITES

ZULFIKAR MOINUDDIN AHMED

I am single at the moment, and I don't have money. I do have good money $120 million owed to me by D. E. Shaw & Co. but Bill Gates was successful in blockading my legitimate income. I am living on disability in my aunt's house listening to the most amazing amount of denigrating abuse while my health is failing and I have diabetes now.

In this situation, it is not really fair to Russian girls who want a good life with someone to tell them lies etc. But I do spend some time chatting with the ladies and I do refer to them as 'dear'. It's nice because I don't know their actual last names, and there is no rush. It's nice to bond with a woman in this sort of situation and I have decided that it's not a bad thing to refer to women as 'dear' even if you will never even meet them for coffee.

Why is this? Well ordinary etiquette developed in very different situations, where there was always an issue of honour involved when sexual intercourse took place. And so there are all sorts of rules of engagement for men and women to preserve civility. I don't generally call women 'dear' unless I become close friends with them. It does not mean as much of course in anonymous interaction with Russian girls on the internet.

But it's pleasant nonetheless. I don't think it is much more than being friendly so long as there is no intention to deceive anyone. And I really have no intention of deceiving anyone. I don't gain anything by that.
