

ZULF FISHES FOR LOVE OF THE HUMAN RACE

ZULFIKAR MOINUDDIN AHMED

You look at two of the benevolent figures at the sordid episode of my life, Christine Lagarde, born 1955, and Lloyd Austin, born 1953. Both were around 20 when I was born. They both have maternal and paternal feelings involved in their benevolence towards me. I mean I don't have that personal relationship with them; but that's what drives them to assist someone far away from them they don't know. They are emotionally mature people who see some qualities in me they think are worthwhile. But it's a maternal and paternal feeling that they are used to. Bill Gates is a sad cat with abnormal underdevelopment and immaturity. That's why his wife is gone when he's 66. His emotional underdevelopment is what leads to seeking to be a monarch. He sees himself as a warrior but attacks his own countryman. In a world where 70% of Americans teach their kids tolerance and respect for others, Bill Gates really thinks that these men and women of ordinary emotional maturity will continue to hold him in high esteem when they find out he is a racial world order zealot. He's a tragic figure the likes of which the Ancient Greek tragedians would not touch. He's narcissitic to the extent that he thinks he will rule over Germany and France too.

Now I would not be interested in the man at all because it's painfully tragic. But he is vile and malevolent and he is hurting me. I can only start wondering was American Government asleep at the wheel for the past five decades?

But I do have the general theory that emotionally mature people at around that age, around 70, do tend to be benevolent towards people around 20 years younger who seem to represent some positive sort of son/daughter qualities. That's part of human nature I think. I am lucky because Lloyd Austin and Christine Lagarde are good people but also they are totally different in ethnicity from me and from each other. I like this for my universal human race theory. Now anecdotal accounts should not produce theories with small sample, but they show that the maternal and paternal benevolent feelings are not ethnicity-bound, and that is good for my own propaganda for universal human race. I like any sort of anecdotal evidence for my own theories and just blast it with a loudspeaker from the rooftops. They are my theories. I like any sort of support for them.
