

PRECISE COMPARISON OF BILL GATES JUSTIFIABILITY OF VIOLENCE VERSUS AMERICAN POPULATION

From World Values Survey Q191, Justifiability of Violence Against Others, we have an accurate population estimate of Americans view about justifiability of violence against others.

First let's do the rough estimate. Let's say 1-5 is 'not justified' and 6-10 is 'justified'. American tally is 92.2% say not justified, and 7.8% say justified. Bill Gates believes that white people ought to have the right to violence against non-whites, so I think it is reasonable to categorise him with 7.8% because by logical inclusion, if he believes that violence is justified against any people at all, then he believes it is justified.

This immediately ensures that Bill Gates represents 7.8% popular moral views regarding violence, regardless of his racial specification. So 92.2% of American people do not believe violence against others is justified at all without racial or other qualifications, and Bill Gates falls in the complement.

There is of course much more specificity to the particular active views of violence against others in Bill Gates that make him even more rare than 7.8% of American people.

I want to make clear that I do not believe that violence against others is justified at all, and for various reasons I think it is justified in exceptional situations of self-defense, so I put myself at 2 rather than 1. So I am here in 92.2% of Americans easily. This is yet another metric in which I can see that I am much more American than Bill Gates, even in values.

Bill Gates is continuously surprised when he finds that other white people do not share his views. He's a total idiot who refuses to actually understand measured published values and is continuously surprised when he discovers that the measured values are actually the convictions of white American majority. My moral values are naturally much closer to white majority in America and the world because I am a good virtuous person and not a criminal, while he is criminal to his very core and narcissistic and do not know anything about ordinary American white values.