

THERE IS NO UNIVERSAL SECRET URGE TO PISS ON PEOPLE AMONG HUMAN BEINGS

ZULFIKAR MOINUDDIN AHMED

A strange new phase opened up with my conflict with Bill Gates. For whatever reason, he seems to have some odd views about secret urges to urinate on other people.

Don't you think that Americans would piss on anything that moves if we had the power?

Let's start with a poster.

To make a long story short, the man literally spent the whole of last night arranging in meta tying me to various latrines so that he and other white people could urinate on me. Now you might think this is awful or you might have other reactions. It's true; that's what he spent last night doing with his power. I have a response in email that I will share later in this note.

But first, I want to remember back to my childhood. When I was a toddler, I did have some period of bedwetting. I don't remember how long it lasted, but I and my brother were sent to various residential schools early in life. I was probably six when that uncertainty began. My parents had decided that we would be better off being socialised in these schools as there were uncertainties in the household. I don't think the bedwetting persisted in the end beyond six.

Now ABC thinks its best for children to potty train between 2 and 3 [1]. I just looked it up on the internet. I became Atheist at around six in my grandmom's house in the summer monsoon season. I was cerebral enough to have some memories. I do not recall ever having any urges to piss on anyone at all. I wonder if I am forgetting earlier times, between 2 and 3. I doubt that there was any moment in my entire life that I would have had any secret urges to piss on anyone at all. I will tell you my own process. I thought pissing and shitting were natural processes, but they were tightly bound in my mind to toilets. I did not think about it too much. I do get disgusted if I think about pissing on any living creature. And I would venture that is extremely normal for human beings. We naturally do not consider our refuse to be pleasant, and we tend not to like to urinate on anything that is living with warm blood at least. Now pissing on grass is actually pleasant, and I do that sometimes although you have to be careful to avoid places where people sit on the grass. But we habituate not to shit except where it is most easily disposed.

These things, I had always thought, were ancient for the human race. You don't find even in the most desperately poor parts of the world people with any propensity to want to piss on other people. It's part of our evolutionary adaptation, and probably was quite the norm 75,000 years ago already in Africa.

I am surprised that Bill Gates is not in tune with the evolution of the human psyche. He literally thinks that American white men all have a secret urge to piss on people and what is stopping American white men from actually pissing on people is simply the lack of power to do this.

The man is abnormal, I would say, in his psychology. He is sufficiently abnormal to pose a threat to the well-being of hundreds of millions of American people and billions of people around the world.

I would recommend that the United States Government officials consider this very seriously. There are more problems from anyone who has the the idea that grown men in civilised nations have secret urges to urinate on other people. That is most certainly far from normal psychological development in human adults.
